

The Daily Vent Screen

This project was primarily inspired by Nomadic Poetry specifically, the concept of nomadic poetry itself and the question posed in the text: "How are we to process art made to be read in between diverse, simultaneous, but often asynchronic interfaces and actions?" This question brought to mind the TSX screen in New York's Times Square. Although it is a fixed location with a stationary screen, people from all over the world can download the TSX app to share content and project it onto the screen for the crowds in the square to see. Much like the idea of Nomadic Poetry which is no longer tethered to the traditional paper page—people can now share things through this method of projection. Even if you aren't in New York, you can convey your message there; I felt this aligned perfectly with the concept of nomadic poetry and offered a response to that central question. Even though the person projecting the content isn't physically in New York, they can synchronize the emotions or messages they wish to share with the people standing in Times Square. Consequently, I created "The Daily Vent Screen." It serves as a platform where people can share daily updates or simply vent their frustrations—activities that are fully welcomed here.

Here, you can see snippets of daily life or short phrases shared by people from around the globe (though in this specific project, the displayed phrases are determined by code). The section headings in Nomadic Poetry such as "Login," "Upload," and "Download"—also provided inspiration during the design process. For instance, the "Login" and "Download" stages mirror the actual requirements for using the TSX screen in Times Square, where one must download the app and log in. I simulated these download and login processes for "The Daily Vent Screen," while the user's act of sharing content corresponds to the "Upload" phase. Furthermore, the use of the word "Download" in various languages reflects the nomadic poetry ethos: people from all corners of the world are downloading the application. Nomadic Poetry posits that the medium is no longer the primary concern—the interface is the message. Thus, while "The Daily Vent Screen" appears to be merely an interface or channel, it actually functions as a vessel for the stories and frustrations shared by people worldwide. You may also notice that the poetic lines submitted by users appear on the right-hand screen and gradually fade away over time; this, too, echoes the nature of nomadic poetry—fluid and ephemeral. The grievances people wish to express at any given moment are fleeting; as time passes, new complaints inevitably arise. Nothing lasts forever. Yet, the fundamental nature of the medium—serving as a vessel for people's messages—remains constant.

Overall, this project draws inspiration from the intersection of "Nomadic Poetry" and the massive digital screens of New York's Times Square. "The Daily Vent Screen" offers a platform where people can speak their minds freely. It serves as a space for emotional release, helping individuals from around the world alleviate the fatigue of daily life. Although this space exists virtually—hosted on the web—the internet has become a vital medium for channeling human emotion. While new mediums for communication may emerge as time moves forward, the essential role of the medium as a vessel for human emotion will never disappear or change.